Little LOST SHEEP

BRRRR! Chill winds blew through the craggy mountain passes, ice covered the hills and valleys and the cold was so intense that it seemed unbearable. Only one little figure could be seen, wandering slowly around and around in pitiful circles.

It was Curly, the little lamb, and he was lost!

Curly was so frozen that he could barely bleat for help. Every time he tried to call, icicles formed from his breath and his voice came out small and weak against the rushing wind.

"Oh, I shall die!" the little lamb wailed. "I shall never find the herd again and our nice warm barn and all my friends. I shall wander about on the mountainside until I am too numb to move. Then . . . it will be all up with me!"

Colder and colder blew the wind, and weaker and weaker grew Curly. Just as he was about to give up and lie down on a snowdrift, a tremendous form appeared in the mouth of a cave! A bear!

The little lamb looked at the huge bear, and the huge bear looked at the little lamb. For an instant, they both stood still. And then, with his last tiny measure of strength, Curly started to run.

The little lamb slipped and slid on the ice-covered rocks, gasping for breath as he went. And behind him, with long, bounding strides, came the sure-footed bear.

"I've got to run . . . run . . . run . . ." Curly murmured. "He must never catch me . . . never!" As he said the second "never," a large clump of ice broke loose from an embankment overhead, and came crashing down on Curly's head. It was too much for the little lamb. Shivering and helpless, he collapsed in the snow, sighing, "This is the end!"

Just then, the gigantic bear overtook him, and reaching down, picked Curly up, cradling the lamb in his warm, furry arms.

"Aren't you . . . going . . . to . . . eat . . . me?" Curly faltered.

"Shaddop!" answered the bear, holding the lamb warmly and snugly. "Don't ask questions, willya?"

He took great bounding strides again, this time in the opposite direction. It seemed to Curly that they traveled for hours, but finally the bear stopped and said to Curly, "Ya warm now?"

"Y . . . yes!" trembled the lamb, fearful of his fate.

"Then g'wan home!" ordered the bear, setting Curly down at a familiar gate. "An' don't go wanderin' off so foolish again!"

"Oh, thank you, thank you!" cried the grateful lamb. "I'll tell everybody what you did for me!"

"Look!" said the bear menacingly. "Never tell dis to anyone, get me? Anyone! I'm s'posed ta be tough, see? If da rest o' da bears find out about dis . . . it'll roon me reputation! Gimme ya woid of honor ta clam up!"

Curly gave his most solemn promise . . . but he never forgot the wonderful bear who had saved his life!

OH, SHUT UP!!

I'VE GOT IT! I'LL GOAD HIM INTO DOING SOMETHING TERRIBLE!... I'LL PUT THIS UNDER HIM, THEN WHEN HE FINDS OUT WHO HE THINKS DID IT...

Turning THE TABLES

THE farmer was purple with rage as he addressed the barnyard. "The trouble with all of you," he shouted, "is you don't work enough! From now on, you'll all work harder and eat less! Hah!" And he stormed out of the barnyard without looking back.

The next day was just pitiful. The horses got a mere handful of hay, the cows got a bit of sweet grass and practically no salt at all, and the geese and hens scurried after a few dried-up kernels of corn. It was sheer starvation!

Everybody was very worried. "We've got to work harder," said the horses, "and show the farmer that we really mean well!"

"Yes, we must," everyone agreed, and they worked twice as hard as ever before.

But the farmer only got more purple in the face and shouted loudly, "See? I kin get work outta you on no food at all, almost! So from now on, you'll all get less!"

Things got even worse after that. The horses got so thin, their ribs were poking out, and pigs weren't roly-poly any more. "What can we do?" everyone kept asking in feeble whispers.

One morning, after the farmer had thrown a few wisps of hay to the horses and a couple of corn kernels to the hens, Pinky Pig got an idea.

He could hardly speak, he was so weak with hunger, but he managed to collect all the barnyard animals around him. "Say," he said hoarsely, "why can't we work this the other way around?"

"What do you mean?" they asked him.

"Just listen," said Pinky, "and . . . bz . . . bz . . . bz . . . Okay?"

"We'll try anything . . . anything!" everyone said.

The next day, when the farmer came around, there was a surprise waiting for him. When he harnessed the horses to the plow, they wouldn't pull it. They just stood stock-still and refused to budge!

When the farmer went to milk the cow, she wouldn't give any milk at all. She just looked at the farmer out of her big, brown eyes and smiled.

When the farmer went to the hen house to gather up the eggs, he couldn't find any. The hens just fluttered around and cackled . . . but no sign of a single egg!

"Hah!" said the farmer. "I guess there's only one thing to do. I'll have to feed you!"

And feed them he did, well and plentifully. Everyone was very grateful to Pinky Pig, who just looked up from the succulent ear of corn he was nibbling and said, "It was easy! All we had to do was turn the tables on the farmer! No food, no work!"

Smart CAT

SOMEONE had put a huge bowl of rich milk out on the back porch and Clive Cat and Dingle Dog saw it at exactly the same moment!

Whizz! Whiz! Cat and dog sprang towards the bowl of milk, eager to enjoy it.

Just as they were about to dip in, Whiskers, a tricky goat, came strolling up the lawn. "Mmmm," said the goat to himself, "all that beautiful milk! I could go for that! Now, all I have to do is figure out some way to get those two away! But how? Let me see . . . aha! I think I've got it. After all, cats and dogs are natural enemies!"

Aloud, the wily goat said to Dingle Dog, "Hiya, Dingle! I hate to stir up trouble, but what'll the other dogs say when they see you sharing a meal with a cat?"

Dingle did not reply. He went right on lapping up the milk.

Whiskers then turned his attention to Clive. "My, my!" he said. "I never saw a cat act so peaceable around a dog before! Guess you're not a real cat, huh?"

Clive didn't even bother to look up. He just went on sipping the creamy milk and daintily licking his mustache.

Whiskers was not going to give up so easily. "Hey, Dingle," he said, turning back to the dog, "I hear a cousin of yours was scratched up last night

. . . bad! Somebody told me a cat did it!" And he looked meaningfully at Clive.

Dingle curled his pink tongue around a fleck of cream and made it disappear.

"Of course, the cat got chewed up pretty bad, too!" Whiskers continued. "Y'know, when a dog loses his temper, he can get mighty rough and tough. Folks tell me it's very dangerous for a cat to get too close to a dog!"

Clive looked lazily at Whiskers, blinked his green eyes, and set to polishing off the bottom of the bowl.

"Dogs shouldn't trust cats, either," Whiskers started to say to Dingle . . . when he realized that all the milk was gone and the bowl was empty!

Dingle Dog and Clive Cat stretched, yawned, and found a nice patch of grass to lie down on. They were all ready for a nap. Whiskers could hardly stand it, for he had been getting hungrier and hungrier and now all the milk had vanished!

"Just a second, you two," he said angrily to Dingle and Clive. "I always thought cats and dogs hated each other!"

Clive Cat looked up at him lazily. "That's what you like to think," he said. "But we've found out that friendship pays off better!"

"Much better!" yawned Dingle Dog happily.
